紅牆

The Red Wall

A homepage built the way KIRA builds a room — from its own materials, its own light, and its own red wall.

Prepared for Kim Wong, Design Director

The work is better than the website.

Awards sit on top of the photography

Four badges cover the rooms you were awarded for. They shrink the work they're meant to prove.

Projects are thumbnails, not evidence

No developer, area, scope or year. A buyer can't assess capability from a caption in brackets.

Your best clients are a footnote

Henderson, Chinachem, Wheelock, Grand Ming, Poly, K&K — the strongest credential you own, set in small grey text.

The categories don't match the grid

Commercial / Residential / Art Collection read as columns, but the projects beneath them ignore it.

IN YOUR OWN WORDS

*“Minimal, but it does not bring out the Interior
Design advantage.”*

That is the whole brief. Restraint only reads as confidence when something is being withheld.

02 — THE IDEA

Your palette was already in your reception.

A lacquer-red wall. Black lettering. Pale oak battens. An orange bench — the same orange as the I in your wordmark. Nothing needed inventing; it needed noticing.

Almost nobody in Hong Kong luxury interiors uses red. It is auspicious, and it is unmistakably yours.

Built, not sketched.

Live, responsive, bilingual EN / 繁體中文 — not a mockup.

WHAT CHANGES

Awards move off the photography

Into a typographic honours rail. The rooms are finally uncovered.

Projects become plates

Developer, area, scope, year and award on every one.

Your clients lead

Six major Hong Kong developers, given their own section.

Four clear routes

Residential · Commercial · Hospitality · Art Collection.

The form routes itself

A developer brief and a private home reach different people.

Three things, and it ships.

01

Your photography

Whatever exists, at whatever quality.
Every image slot is already sized and labelled for what it needs.

02

The hotel projects

Names, locations, years and scope.
Hospitality becomes a real fourth route
the moment they arrive.

03

The logo as SVG

The wordmark is staying. Real letterforms will tune the spacing of the whole type system.

Once those land: project pages, the three sector routes, and the Chinese copy read by someone in your office. Two weeks to a site you can send a developer.
